The main theme of the Conference, “Barents - a region attractive to young people”, underlined that realization of the capacity of young people is a fundamental precondition for a prosperous future for the Barents Euro-Arctic region. Young people are an important strategic resource and will, within the cultural, social and economic policies, contribute to a sustainable development of the region. Among the most valuable advantages of young people are their education and skills, their mobility, quick adaptation and creative potential. Thanks to those characteristics the youth has a unique opportunity to activate cultural, social and economical mechanisms of intensive innovative development of their countries and the Barents Region as such.

Youth cooperation, exchanges and activities taking place across the national borders in the region will improve the mutual understanding and respect of different cultural, social and economic traditions in the countries of the Barents Region. These are also main instruments in promoting peace and good neighborhood in the region.

Young people's ability to take initiatives and promote transition to innovative way of development is mainly connected with large investments into the human capital. Today youth policy should be considered as an instrument of cultural, social and economic development, providing for the competition capacity of the countries and the region, as well as strengthening of the civil society, providing for good living conditions of the citizens.
